“During my time in undergrad, medical school, and now as a family medicine resident, I have found that there is a significant amount of research coming out of Europe, specifically Germany, that is relevant to my studies of interest. While many of the larger publications eventually get translated into English, there are several smaller publications that never do, and those that do, often take months to years. Not only have I expanded my resources, but since many medical terms and concepts stem from the German language, I have a better understanding and have therefore expanded my knowledge base simply by being proficient in German.”
